

Children's artwork made into bespoke jewelry

Art is embracing technology in many ways. One local government is using sculpture to gather public opinion, and a cargo train is providing collaborative, mobile art experiences. Turkish jeweler Tasarim Takarim is making modern heirlooms of children's artwork. Rather than let a favorite creation gather dust in a file, the jeweler turns it into gold or silver jewelry or small desktop sculptures.

Working from emailed photos of the artwork, the jeweler's team takes around a week to perfect each piece. Necklaces, bracelets, brooches, cufflinks and desktop sculptures are available. Prices for a small necklace start at around USD 300, as each piece is bespoke. The jeweler works in sterling silver and provides gold-plated versions as well.

How else could technology and art be used to preserve work and memories, especially for older generations?
